ADVENTURES OF THE TWINS

by Olive Roberts Barton

The Green Shoes.

Nancy and Nick, the twins, rushed off to the chestnut tree as soon as the dew was dry on the grass. They were anxious to see the magical mushrooms again, and find out what it meant by talking of green shoes.

Sure enough there it was tucked away safely behind the stone where they had left it, and beside it were two pairs of the queerest little green shoes you can imagine.

"Good morning, children!" said the mushroom. "I'm glad you came early. Now sit down and listen carefully to what I'm going to tell you."

"I have an idea that it isn't going to be easy to find that monkey of yours. It may take days and days, and so to make things a little easier for I'm going to be sort of a fairy godmother. Now to begin, suppose you try on those green shoes and see if they fit."

"Good morning, children," said the mushroom. "I'm glad you came so early."

Nancy and Nick slipped off their sandals and put on the funny shoes. They couldn't have fit better if the store man himself had tried them on.

"That's splendid!" said the mushroom after the twins had stamped around awhile. "Now, Nancy, suppose you pick me up and put me in your pocket. There! That's the way!"

And although the mushroom could not be seen any more its voice was as clear as ever to the children's great surprise.

"As long as you are careful of me," it went on "you can understand what everything says, animals, trees, flowers, toys, everything in the world. And when you have your green shoes on you can go anywhere you wish or be any size you choose. But I can't tell you where to go. You must choose your own way of hunting Jocko."

"Hadn't we better be starting now?"
